Working hard and waiting long;
Afterward—the golden reaping,
Harvest home and grateful song.

MAINE MAY HAVE ELECTED DEM. GOVERNOR

PORTLAND, Maine, Sept. 15.—The result of the state elections, held yesterday, are in doubt, with Curtis, the Democratic candidate for governor, slightly in the lead in the count over William T. Haines, the Republican incumbent.

The general vote shows great Republican gains and a tremendous falling off in the Progressive strength. The leading Progressive candidate for a state office polled only thirty-seven per cent of the vote cast for Theodore Roosevelt two years ago.

The greater part of the Progressive strength has returned to the Republicans, that party polling a total of one hundred and thirty-four per cent greater than the Taft vote of 1912. The Democratic vote shows a gain of fifteen per cent over Wilson's vote. These figures are made up from incomplete returns.

FATE OF THE CLOCK IN HANDS OF COMMITTEE

Whether Honolulu shall start the working day one hour earlier and close the day one hour earlier is being threshed out in the rooms of the Chamber of Commerce this afternoon by a committee of nine businessmen, appointed by the chamber to decide the question pro or con, and report back. The original committee, which consisted of five persons, has been increased to nine, the new members being L. Tenney Peck, John R. Galt, T. H. Petrie and J. T. Warren.

The movement to move the hands of the clock forward one hour was launched by C. G. Bockus and, in many quarters has been favorably met with.

Mr. Bockus has in his possession several letters from civic organizations in cities which have adopted the plan. The plan is strongly endorsed by them.

DENVER SCRIBE WRITES VIVIDLY OF PRIVATE AUDIENCE WITH QUEEN

Liliuokalani Receives Joseph M. Grady, Who Greatly Enjoys Interview

(By JOSEPH M. GRADY.)
(Staff Correspondent of the Denver Post.)

HONOLULU.—This forenoon I had the honor of being accorded a private audience by Her Majesty Queen Liliuokalani, and while the mental notes I made during that most interesting interview still are fresh in my mind, I hasten to transcribe them for the benefit of Post readers who may be interested in knowing how the famous woman, who was once, in fact, as she still is, in name and in the heart of her people, queen of these islands, is spending the evening of her life.

The queen was born Sept. 2, 1838, and is, therefore, 76 years of age, lacking one month, and, notwithstanding the fact that her monarchy has been overthrown and strangers rule her dominions, she still proudly signs herself "Liliuokalani" of Hawaii, which is recognized as her legal name. As a rule the queen does not receive strangers, and for the very good reason that most of those who try to meet her are actuated solely and only by motive of idle curiosity. There are some tourists vulgar enough to regard her as one of the curiosities of the islands and when refused permission to intrude on the privacy of her majesty's life, complain that they have been cheated out of one of their rights. Tourists sometimes leave their good manners behind them when they leave home, and this remark does not by any means apply to American tourists only. The genus is about alike, no matter what country they hail from.

I was fortunate enough to gain an introduction to Col. C. P. Iaukea, a native who has been attached to the royal family all his life; in fact, he was educated at the expense of the sovereign, both in Honolulu and abroad, and he now is managing trustee and treasurer of the Liliuokalani trust and business representative of the queen.

Utmost courtesy is accorded him. Colonel Iaukea treated me with the utmost courtesy and promised to use his best efforts to arrange for an interview with her majesty but could not set any definite date. It all would depend, he told me, on the light in which the queen viewed my request, but as the two men who had given me an introduction to him also were known to her majesty, he felt sure that the matter could be arranged some day, and he would notify me in proper time.

Yesterday being Sunday and the seventieth birthday of the leader of the Royal Hawaiian band, which he has led since he first organized it forty-two years ago, there was a meeting held in the grounds of the government building at which Governor Pinkham and other leading men of the territory appeared, to do honor to the veteran bandmaster. The queen consented to appear on the platform and pin the medal, which was presented to him by the members of the band, on his breast. After the ceremonies were over Colonel Iaukea motioned me to approach and, in an informal manner, presented me to the aged queen. She extended me her hand over which I bowed low and said something expressive of how highly honored I felt at meeting her. Leaning heavily on the arms of her attendants the queen descended from the platform and, as the party was approaching the waiting carriage, Colonel Iaukea turned around, raised his hand to me and said, "I'll see you tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock." And I knew that he had obtained her majesty's consent to receive me.

Promptly at 10 He Presents Himself. Promptly at the hour of ten this morning I called at Colonel Iaukea's office, which is situated within the grounds of the queen's private residence. The colonel was courteous itself and at once dropped the work he was engaged on and, requesting me to remain seated for a short time, left the office and crossed over to the mansion. In about ten minutes he returned and together we entered the reception room of the queen. In about the center of which her majesty was seated on a richly carved mahogany armchair in a position of seemingly unstudied grace and languorous ease. Her hands rested easily on the richly carved arms. The chair was flanked at either side with royal Kahilis, the ancient insignia of the Hawaiian royalty. These long, slender staffs were draped in some yellow gauze-like stuff and were surmounted with plumes made from the tiny feathers of the royal mamo bird, now extinct. There was nothing remarkable about the room of the queen. It was richly but not elaborately furnished, but the space back where the queen was seated was striking in the almost barbaric splendor of its decorations, as if it were the sanctum sanctorum, at the outer portals of which she had placed herself on guard.

"Your majesty," said Colonel Iaukea, "permit me to present Mr. Grady of Colorado, representing the Denver Post." The queen slightly bowed her head in acknowledgment while a faint smile flitted across her dark brown face. I said something about begging her majesty to accept the assurance of my most profound respect and veneration, which seemed to please her as she smiled again and motioned me to a seat on her left, while Colonel Iaukea, also at her request, seated himself on her right.

The photographs that I had seen of the queen represented her as being a large, robust woman, and I have no doubt but that they were good pictures at the time they were taken, but she has changed much since those days. It is characteristic of the women of the pure Hawaiian race to put on flesh up to a certain age, after which they begin to lose it until in old age they become quite thin, and Liliuokalani of Hawaii is a Hawaiian of the Hawaiians, and, besides, I have been told that she has aged very much in the last few years. And yet I like her much better as she appears today than as she is shown in the photographs of former years. There is a sweetness and dignity in her every movement, in her winning smile, in her conversation, that is most attractive. She speaks English fluently and correctly but with a slight accent of a captivated foreigner.

Her majesty is of most distinguished appearance; of a rich dark brown color, with elegant black eyes, which seem to express her thoughts and feelings as readily as does her tongue. On this occasion she was elegantly gowned in a toilet of black satin, draped upon her shoulders with a black Chantilly lace which fell about her in graceful folds. The square yolk of black Chantilly lace was caught at the throat with an old-fashioned brooch containing the miniature of her husband, the late Governor John O. Dominis. Her black hair, touched with gray, was coiled about her head in the style that I believe is known as the crown of other days could have so added distinction to that regal bearing which was the gift of heritage. On her left wrist the queen wore a enormous gold cable-link bracelet, and on the right wrist one of a plain silver band with slightly raised edges, and, and bearing some inscription. The contrast between the two bracelets was as striking as the difference in their intrinsic values.

Her Formality Gradually Melts. During the first part of the interview her majesty was inclined to be very formal, but when I referred to an amusing incident in connection with the speech of the German bandmaster, on whose breast she had pinned the medal the preceding day, she relaxed, and from that on to the close she seemed to be in the best of spirits. Her apparent enjoyment of the moment seemed rather to accentuate than otherwise the winning dignity and the womanly charm of the queen.

HOME RULE FOR IRELAND HELD UP FOR YEAR

LONDON, Eng., Sept. 15.—Premier Asquith announced yesterday that the Irish Home Rule Laws and the Welsh Disestablishment Bill will be placed upon the statute books this week. He also announced that an attempt would be made to place these laws in operation within a year at least.

GIRL WHO CHANGED COUNTERS.

On the day when she left the counter forever, Caroline Shipley told her experience to a number of school-girls and their mothers, interested, as indeed any thoughtful person would be, in the narration of a woman who has worked, and who, as she has worked, has thought.

"Most of us have known each other all our lives," she said, "but you who have not had any city experience perhaps do not know how much more fortunate is the average working girl living in a small town than is her sister who works in the city. All of you know my life—how my father was clerk and bookkeeper and general manager of the Royal Hotel, and how, when I was 13 and my brother 20, he was stricken with that long, lingering illness which lasted until his death. There was only enough money to support mother and him. John and I had to work. John went West to an uncle who made an opening for him, while I stayed at home to do the nearest thing at hand.

"Luella Swan, one of my best friends, worked in White's, then the biggest store in town, but it was not big enough for her ambitions. Her uncle was a buyer in a big department store in the city and he had found her a position that paid her more than twice what she was getting. She used her influence to get me her old place in White's store with a wage of $6.00 a week. That salary meant more to me than it does now, and it was much more in a country town than it would have been in the city, and it was infinitely more to me than living at home. I would have been to one boarding. I insisted on paying mother to live with me, because I wanted her to have the half of all I made."—Maude Radford Warren, in Woman's World for September.

Musical Pronunciation. If I wish my friend to understand what I say, I must pronounce my words correctly. And if he writes to me I must be able to read his letter or I cannot understand what he writes. To understand a spoken message or a written message I must know English letters, words and sentences.

This rule which applies to the English language also applies to the music language. A musical performance is a message spoken in the music language. A printed piece of music is a letter sent to us in the music language. To understand either, we must know the letters, the words and the sentences of the music language. A note of the music language is the same as a letter of the English language. A chord (or group of notes) of the music language is the same as a word (or group of letters) of the English language. A phrase of music language is the same as a sentence of the English language.—Dr. Von Liebig, in Woman's World for September.

Her majesty spoke to me on many subjects, serious and otherwise, and always without reserve. No, she indulges in no regrets at having lost the sovereignty of the islands, she said. "What was to happen did happen, and I accept the inevitable as cheerfully as I may," she continued. "I live in the love and affection of my retainers and my people, and I am accorded the respect due my position by those who govern the islands now. And then, this man," she said, pointing an accusing finger at Colonel Iaukea as she smiled affectionately on him, "this man sets me tasks to perform which I cannot decline, because they interest me." He leaves me no idle time in which to dwell on memories of the past, and so I have much, very much, to make me happy."

And then, when I ventured to say to her, "Your majesty, this man," and I pointed to Colonel Iaukea as she had done, "this man is rendering you the best possible service in finding your majesty congenial work; this man," and I again pointed to him, "as you call him," and she laughed softly, "knows the importance of a sound mind in a sound body, and I know, and your majesty must know, that it is from the worth of his loyalty and love that he finds means to keep your mind employed." Colonel Iaukea then, as if in his own defense, went on to tell me of the task on which the queen is now engaged. It is that of compiling and translating into English a great number of Hawaiian words of which she alone of all her race has exact knowledge. Such words as were used by members of the royal line and by chiefs of the highest rank—words which, when spoken by them, were thoroughly well understood but never used by the common people. As he explained these things to me the queen's face beamed with pleasure, and she said, "I have explained to you the task on which I am engaged, and I am glad to have you know it."
